They observed 852 people in mixed-sex seating arrangements. 852 people in mixed seating arrangements

They found that males, when sitting next to females, were 75% more likely to use the common armrest.
They also found that males aged 18 - 40 were more annoyed when denied access to the armrest (particularly when a female did the denying!).
Do guys slouch more?

posted by John Murphy 20 minutes ago

I'm a sixteen year old guy from Limerick City and I've been watching other guys on my local bus route to see how they hold themselves while commuting.

From what I've seen men generally slouch more while the women I've observed sit fairly upright.

Anyone else got an opinion or noticed this pattern amongst men in their area?

Would greatly appreciate any comments or feedback :)

Hey John,

Definitely noticed this with guys on my local bus route too, especially when they're on their phones.

Falsehoods Programmers Believe About Names

Posted on June 17, 2010 by Patrick in Uncategorized

[This post has been translated into Japanese by one of our readers: 和訳もあります。]

John Graham-Cumming wrote an article today complaining about how a computer system he was working with described his last name as having invalid characters. It of course does not, because anything someone tells you is their name is — by definition — an appropriate identifier for them. John was

Falsehoods Programmers believe about Gender

You may have read some of highly popular posts regarding falsehoods programmers believe about names, time, geography, and addresses. There is also a short list on github regarding gender. In this post I will expand on things assumed to be true about gender in a similar fashion.

1. Everyone is male.
2. Everyone is female.
3. People are either male or female.
